

From the river to the sea, EVERYONE must be free!

The Quds News Network (QNN) is facing a new cyberattack; this time it is happening on Wikipedia.

A team of Wikipedia's editors, linked to Israel, is trying to create a false claim about the network, promoting false information about it, its role, and its editorial policy.

This could adversely affect the network's ability to effectively reach its Palestinian, Arab, and international audiences across various platforms.

Recently, those editors have intensively modified the description of the network on Wikipedia, presenting an incorrect description based on Israeli sources and others associated with the Israeli propaganda machine, in a clear breach of the website's core principles and its policy regarding the acceptance of descriptions, sources, and necessary revisions.

QNN's page on Wikipedia has been edited with false claims about QNN's identity without any basis as part of a wider vicious campaign against journalism. The campaign aims at subjecting QNN to defamation to silence it and silence Palestine's voice, depending on misleading Israeli sources linked to Israel's propaganda machinery of defamation and misinformation.

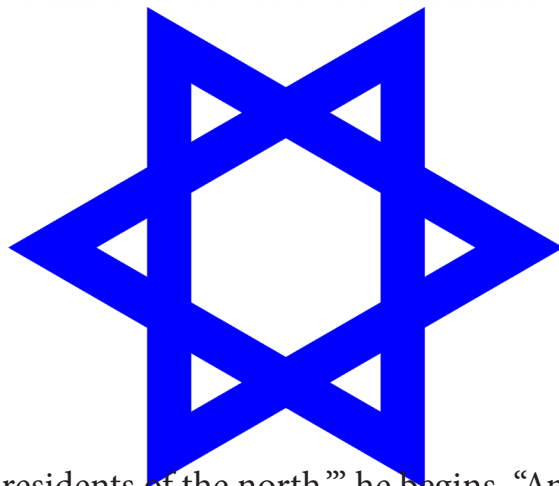

Quds News Network is a Palestinian independent and comprehensive youth news network, founded in 2011. Our correspondents are distributed across all cities of historic Palestine, voluntarily liberating themselves from the conditions of funders and parties.

QNN does not adhere to any specific ideology, rather it aligns with the values of freedom, dignity, and the fulfillment of the Palestinian people's aspirations for their right to self-determination under international law and the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. We work professionally without succumbing to political propaganda. Our goals are to build common ground for the unity of the Palestinian internal front and create an electronic space characterized by credibility, with Palestine as our sole compass.

Golan is looking ahead. The person who was slammed from all sides in the wake of his 2016 speech, as deputy chief of staff of the Israel Defense Forces (“If there’s something that frightens me about Holocaust remembrance, it’s the recognition of revolting processes that occurred in Europe in general, and particularly in Germany, back then”), who was pushed out of Meretz, has been recreated as a national hero. Suddenly he’s part of the consensus. He no longer thinks in terms of leading Meretz. During a visit to the south with him, in response to a question about the threat that Hezbollah constitutes, Golan chooses to recite “the speech that the prime minister should have delivered.”

“Dear residents of the north,” he begins. “Apparently we will not destroy Hezbollah in the near future, but we are acting so that we will be able to live in our communities with security, and therefore I have instructed the IDF to triple and even quadruple the size of our order of battle on the borderline.”

“Have no fear,” Golan says, continuing the alternative speech by the prime minister, “the IDF will know how to remove every threat of penetration of the communities, and I assure you faithfully that a permanent military presence will remain in every community along the northern border. I call on you to return home. The return will be done in stages according to a blueprint that I will present.”

Concluding, Golan says, “That is what [Prime Minister Benjamin] Netanyahu should have said, if he weren’t so abject and pathetic. If he were capable of standing before the nation and speaking the truth.”
